

I wake up and see the trees,

One by one they wave back at me welcoming me into this new day.

I don't care.

"There are people who would die for the oxygen you're breathing," my mom scolds.

Sunrise is sure to come, and without it I'd be too cold to wear my new outfit and stunt.

"It's a luxury to complain about your outfits."

"People would be so grateful for your wardrobe," my mom retorts.

The lights are still on in the bathroom.

I forgot to turn them off after I showered, eh - I don't care.

"That same electricity people would kill for, you're wasting and running up our bill report."

The sheer ignorance toward global issues is why people don't realize how much they take for granted.

A lot of things are changing for good and bad, but it's not your fault so you don't care -

It doesn't affect you so you don't care -

You never saw it happen with your own eyes so you don't care.

People are dying at historic rates due to disease, climate change, and war.

But I stay in a tiny state. What can I do to help? I'm insignificant in the grand scheme so why even try -

Everything is already set in stone...

Besides, even if I could help -

Who ever cared about my issues, huh?

Eh -

I don't care.
